

PREFACE

The first issue of this Review appeared in May 1967. It was so well received, within and outside the University, that those responsible for the second issue decided to publish it in a volume comparable with The New Zealand Universities Law Review. I am sure that their confidence in the future of the Review will be justified.

The Editors and Business Manager have again demonstrated that an undergraduate publication can achieve high standards, both in content and presentation. Those responsible are to be congratulated. The Law Students' Society, which meets the cost of publication, is also to be congratulated on its enterprise. The Society now derives almost all of its income from its own members, who have accepted the Review as one of the main responsibilities of the Society.

Although it may be found desirable in the future to include articles and notes prepared by those outside the student body, the Editors have confined this issue to student writing which, it will be agreed, deserves encouragement.
