Notes on the Weather for November, 1941.

General Notes.—During November New Zealand experienced changeable, windy weather which, although typical of late spring, was not relieved by settled spells normally expected. Hence, there was little sign of the season overcoming its backwardness. Conditions have varied considerably with locality, but in general terms it may be said that the weather has continued dry to the east of the ranges and in the far north, while elsewhere it has been wet with inadequate sunshine. Drought conditions were effectively relieved in Central Otago. Stock in sheep-farming districts have thriven, although the cold period has been the longest in years. Otago was rather cooler than usual elsewhere. Winds, however, accentuated the feeling of coolness, but prevented sharp frosts. On the 3rd and 4th the winds were gale force in many places and considerable rain fell in districts from Taranaki southward. The low-pressure system crossed the Dominion on the 7th and 8th and was followed by strong southerlies over the whole of the country. The east coast had a short period of showers, while snow showers occurred in the southern ranges as well as locally about the Dunedin hills.

Weather Sequence.—After the passage of a secondary disturbance on the 1st southerlys prevailed, bringing heavy showers and numerous isolated thunderstorms, often with heavy hail. Precipitation on the 3rd and 4th kept the winds south-westly, giving scattered rain.

On the 5th an anticyclone to the north-west intensified while pressure was very low to the south, so that west to north-west winds gave gale force in many places and considerable rain fell in districts from Taranaki southward. The low-pressure system crossed the Dominion on the 7th and 8th and was followed by strong southerlies over the whole of the country. The south coast had a short period of showers, while snow showers occurred in the southern ranges as well as locally about the Dunedin hills.

On the 10th conditions were good generally, an anticyclone covering New Zealand. As this was replaced by a low-pressure system from the Tasman Sea north-westers increased to gale strength in places on the 17th and drizzle and rain set in in western districts. As the trough passed, winds changed to the west or south-west. For several days typical westerly weather continued with gales in exposed positions and most of the rain in and west of the ranges. A disturbance on the 17th gave heavy showers and thunderstorms in a number of districts. A further disturbance in the south on the 19th caused extensive rain over the southern portion of the South Island.

On the 21st pressure became more uniform and rather cloudy conditions prevailed, with scattered drizzle and fog in the Cook Strait area. However, on the 21st some very heavy rain was experienced in the Shannon neighbourhood. New disturbances on the 25th brought a period of moderate rain to the central parts of the country, the situation reverting to the westerly type with further falls in all western districts. By the 29th a south-westerly change had become general, there being scattered showers and thunderstorms. Conditions had improved again on the 30th.
