Summary of the Records of Temperature, Rainfall, and Sunshine for October, 1943

General. Although conditions were frequently unsettled during October the month was an improvement on September. Several deep depressions passed over the New Zealand region from the north-west, but there was no persistence of strong westerly winds as is commonly experienced in the spring. Instead, the east coast had more dull southerly weather than usual. Unsuitable weather has further delayed farming programmes and the season is about a fortnight late. Towards the end of the month growth became more rapid, but pastures especially were not so much improved as in the central provinces.

Rainfall. In spite of the rather frequent occurrence of rain, totals were fairly light over extensive areas. Average values were exceeded about the Bay of Islands, near New Plymouth, and in coastal districts from New Plymouth to Dunedin. About Gisborne and Wellington City conditions were frequently unsettled during October the month was an improvement on September. Several deep depressions passed over the New Zealand region from the north-west, but there was no persistence of strong westerly winds as is commonly experienced in the spring. Instead, the east coast had more dull southerly weather than usual. Unsuitable weather has further delayed farming programmes and the season is about a fortnight late. Towards the end of the month growth became more rapid, but pastures especially were not so much improved as in the central provinces.

Temperature. At all places it was a cool month, departures being about 1° F. in the North Island but often 2° or 3° between Wairarapa and Taranaki. In Westland, however, temperatures were slightly above normal. Light frosts between the 17th and 19th were sufficient to injure tender garden plants in several districts.
