Flight Lieutenant Frederick Norman Rhyas Thomas (NZ 40993), Royal New Zealand Air Force, of Nelson.

By his courage, skill, and determination in the face of danger this pilot was at one time seriously wounded, and made a brilliant landing without further damage on an emergency strip only 1,900 ft. long. Captain of one of three aircraft detailed to bomb a Japanese supply area in the Bismarck area at dawn on 9th September, 1944, Flight Lieutenant Thomas reached his target after flying through darkness, heavy rain, and thunderstorms. He immediately attacked with courage and determination. Two bombs hung up on his first run, and he therefore strafed his way round the target area and made a further run, in the face of heavy enemy fire, to release his remaining bombs. As they dropped in the target area, his starboard engine cut out, the main fuel line having been shot away by anti-aircraft fire. Flight Lieutenant Thomas was faced with exceptional difficulty. Extremely bad weather on the direct course to base made it undesirable to attempt the return on motor, and loss of power prevented a crossing of the highlands of New Ireland. Accordingly, he set course for an emergency strip at Talasea, New Britain. It was doubtful in the extreme if the aircraft would remain in the air, and it was only by the pilot's determination and skill in making use of up-currents below cumulus clouds that he kept sufficient altitude throughout-out a most hazardous flight of two hours' duration. His landing was an outstanding achievement, particularly with only one engine working and throughout he displayed the utmost coolness and courage. Flight Lieutenant Thomas has completed over two hundred and sixty hours' operational flying in the Pacific in the past year.
