in the south, where new records were established. The previous coldest October was in 1930, but probably for the country as a whole, suffice it to say that the cold temperatures were about two degrees below normal in the North Island and often three to four degrees south of the central high country. The frontal zone lingered near the centre of the Island and a deep depression approached Nelson, but filled up on the 30th as it passed northward. The frontal rain brought showers to western and southern districts.

Weather Sequence.—A vigorous secondary began to cross New Zealand late on the 18th, and strong south-westerlies became widespread over the South Island on the 19th. Scattered heavy falls occurred in the eastern districts, and strong south-westerly winds with snow showers continued east of the southern high country. A deepening depression passing eastward from the area on the latter day. To the north, westerlies which increased to gale strength blew from the Chatham Islands and southerlies persisted, the weather being mostly fine in the west, but showers continued east of the high country. Snow fell on the foothills of both islands. A deep depression remained just south of Methven, and the weather was much cold and frosty.

A vigorous cold front moved over New Zealand on the 4th and 5th and gave very showery conditions, including snow in the high country and to some lower levels, especially in Canterbury. A high-pressure ridge was passing over the South Island on the 6th when frosts were widespread.

General.—The weather in October was unsettled with exceptionally cold temperatures, conditions being very little milder than in September. Consequently, the season is very backward and all growth is slow. Feed is rather short, and few paddocks have been closed for hay and ensilage. Stock, and especially lambs, have not progressed as well as usual.

Rainfall.—Rainfall was below average over most of the Auckland and Hawke's Bay Provinces, especially in the more eastern portions. South of Waikato and through Taranaki and Wellington there was excess rainfall. Marked showers fell in the east of Chatham Islands and southerlies persisted, the weather being mostly fine in the west, but showers continued east of the high country. Snow fell on the foothills of both islands. A deep depression remained just south of Methven, and the weather was much cold and frosty.

A front passed over the North Island on the 10th. The chief feature was the anticyclone to the north, and fair westerly weather prevailed.

A vigorous secondary began to cross New Zealand late on the 18th, and strong south-westerly winds with snow showers continued east of the southern high country. A deep depression passing eastward from the area on the latter day. To the north, westerlies which increased to gale strength blew from the Chatham Islands and southerlies persisted, the weather being mostly fine in the west, but showers continued east of the high country. Another vigorous cold front moved over New Zealand on the 4th and 5th and gave very showery conditions, including snow in the high country and to some lower levels, especially in Canterbury. A high-pressure ridge was passing over the South Island on the 6th when frosts were widespread.

A weak trough passed from the west on the 6th and 7th, with a few brief showers chiefly in the west, but fair weather predominated. On the 8th another weak trough moved up the South Island, but retreated temporarily and then became indistinct over the North Island on the 10th. The chief feature was the anticyclone to the north, and fair westerly weather prevailed.

A cold front associated with a depression far to the south passed eastward on the 17th and gave only a brief south-westerly wind in New Zealand. A vigorous secondary began to cross New Zealand late on the 18th. Widespread rain occurred in the central provinces on the 2nd and 3rd, a deepening depression passing eastward from the area on the latter day.
