On the 7th a ridge of high pressure developed in the north, but pressures remained very low to the south as a series of westerly depressions passed across New Zealand. Strong westerlies predominated over the North Island, increasing in force to gales. After the passage of another depression across the centre of the country on the night of the 10th, barometers began to rise with the approach of an extensive anticyclone from the Tasman Sea. Following a change to southerly gales, temperatures became very cold and snow fell to low levels in the south. There was a clearance in Westland on the 10th and two days later wind became light to force 2 gales. Gales spread eastwards and northwards. In the north the improvement was delayed by the development of a small secondary depression which crossed Northland from the south-west on the 13th.

The anticyclone became much elongated in a north-easterly direction, and on the 16th it divided into a second anticyclonic cell extended on to the South Island. Meanwhile the main portions of the Tasman depression had advanced slowly westwards, and on the 21st passed to the east of the Domed Island. Conditions remained very unsettled over the Auckland Province until the end of the month while two wave depressions moved rapidly across the South Island producing further rain except in a few sheltered east coast districts.
