Notes on the Weather for November 1933

The rainfall in Taranaki, and also over the greater part of South Island, Gisborne, and the Bay of Plenty were commenced on the 14th, bringing a temporary improvement to the West Coast. There were showers in many districts, but fair weather persisted another depression passed far to the south. Rain was mainly confined to western districts and was heavy in the north. The weather was unsettled and rain occurred over the West Coast, and there was some rain along the south coast and about Cook Strait. With an anticyclone to the north and deep depressions passing far to the south, the weather was settled over the South Island and about Cook Strait. On the 21st and 22nd the weather was fair over most of the country. On the 23rd a trough of low pressure moved through the country, bringing a depression formed over the Tasman Sea on the 25th and moved slowly south-eastward on the 26th. On the following day, as the depression passed to the south of South Island, and moved further to the south, the weather was mainly fine. On the 27th, the trough of low pressure which had been stationary over South Island became active again and moved northwards over the country, bringing a depression over the north-eastern part of South Island and some light falls over Cook Strait. On the 27th Westland had its first day of fair weather for over a week, but received another moderate rain on the 30th as another depression passed to the south.

M. A. F. BARNETT, Director.
