

north-easterly winds caused damage in the Bay of Plenty. Rain was lighter on the following day as the depressions lost intensity, and on the 17th there was fair weather again with the passage of an anticyclone across the country.

The anticyclone moved south-eastward, and with the approach of a very deep depression from the Central Tasman Sea conditions deteriorated on the West Coast on the 18th. For the next two days rain was general, and the passage of the depression just west of Southland on the 19th caused strong northerly gales over the South Island. The weather remained unsettled on the 21st and 22nd, with a change to southerly winds accompanied by colder temperatures. For the next four days an anticyclone was centred over the Western Tasman Sea and pressure remained low to the south and south-east. A south-westerly airstream covered the country, bringing showery conditions to the Auckland Province, to western districts of both islands, and to the far south.

By the 27th the anticyclone had moved into the Eastern Tasman Sea, and there were three days of fine weather during its passage across New Zealand. Rain set in over the Auckland Province on the 30th as a depression over the North Tasman Sea moved on to Northland, and the deterioration became general on the following day with the formation of another depression west of Southland.
