The period from the 4th to the 14th was one of westly to south westerly winds, with pressures high over the Tasman Sea and the North Island and low to the south and south-east. The weather was frequently unsettled in Southland and on the West Coast; and more general showers affected many districts on the 5th, with snow on the Southland high country and the North Island ranges. More general showers were reported again on the 12th, and in some North Island districts showers persisted on the following two days.

A belt of high pressure across the country brought mainly fine weather on the 15th. However, during the next two days a vigorous trough crossed New Zealand with rain on the West Coast at first, later spreading to many other districts. The greater part of Marlborough and the South Island were not affected. From the 18th to the 22nd an anticyclone moved slowly from the South Tasman across the country, with settled conditions.

A complex depression developed over the Tasman Sea, and on the 23rd the weather deteriorated in Fiordland and Southland and also in Northland. During the next two days the depression crossed the country and rain became general over the North Island, being heavy in the Bay of Plenty. In the South Island the rain was lighter and parts of Canterbury received little or none. Another trough soon followed, with general rain on the 26th and 27th, except in Gisborne and Hawke's Bay.

For the last four days of the month north-westerly to westerly winds predominated, with a very deep depression at first almost stationary off the south-western tip of Southland. Rain affected the greater part of the country, but in eastern districts from northern Hawke's Bay to Invercargill the weather was mainly fair.
