Change in New Zealand Standard Time and Radio Frequency Standard

FOR several years the internationally adopted definition of the second, which governs all time and frequency measurements, has been based on a particular resonant frequency of the caesium atom. To keep civil time in close agreement with astronomical time, as determined by the rotation of the Earth, it has been necessary to maintain the civil second slightly longer than the atomic second, and to make occasional changes in its length, and periodic step adjustments in civil time. At present the civil second is 300 parts in 10^{10} longer than the atomic second, and frequency standards are offset from the atomic standard by a similar amount.

The Bureau International de l'Heure, after international consultation, has decided that from 1 January 1972, the time interval used throughout the world will be the atomic second, and frequency standards will be permanently based on the atomic second, without any offset. Future adjustments to keep civil time close to astronomically derived time will be made by periodically omitting one exact second from the reckoning of civil time. These adjustments will be made only on 1 January or 1 July, in any year as required. It is anticipated that adjustments will normally be needed once a year.

From 1 January 1972, New Zealand Standard Time, as kept and transmitted by the New Zealand Time Service, Geophysics Division, D.S.I.R., will be based directly on the atomic second, and the New Zealand radio frequency standard, as maintained and transmitted by the Physics and Engineering Laboratory, D.S.I.R., will be adjusted accordingly to a new, slightly higher, frequency by removing the present offset of 300 parts in 10^{10} .

Dated at Wellington this 27th day of January 1972.

B. E. TALBOYS, Minister of Science.
