Conditions as to the Resistance of Electrical Installations to Earthquake and Other Damage

PURSUANT to regulation 61 of the Electrical Supply Regulations 1976, the Secretary of Energy hereby prescribes the following design loadings and procedures for power houses, substations, and associated plant:

1. Except as otherwise provided in this notice every power house, substation and associated plant (hereinafter referred to as "the installation") shall comply with the requirements of:

- (a) New Zealand Standard NZS 4203:1976 and
- (b) New Zealand Standard NZS 4219 (when published)

insofar as they are considered appropriate by the electrical supply authority concerned having regard to the stated scope of those standards.

2. If in the opinion of the electrical supply authority the above standards are not appropriate, the installation shall be designed to survive with unimpaired operating ability earthquake-induced forces as indicated by the single body response spectra in the drawing numbered Z5694 "Standard Earthquake Response Spectra for General Design Purposes" deposited at the office of the Electricity Division of the Ministry of Energy at Wellington.

3. In complying with the requirements of paragraph 2 hereof the forces specified therein may be reduced by multiplying by the following zoning factors, the zones being defined by Figure 4 of NZS 4203:1976.

Zone	Zone Factor
B	5/6
C	2/3

4. Where the electrical supply authority concerned is of the opinion that it is inappropriate to carry out the analysis required in paragraphs 2 and 3 hereof, the installation shall be designed to ensure that the installation and its component parts will withstand a horizontal force, acting through the appropriate centre of gravity equal to 0.75 times the relevant weight, except that—

- (i) any installation rigidly constructed and installed on rigid foundations, that is, having no mode of vibration with a period exceeding 0.1 seconds may be installed to withstand horizontal forces acting through the appropriate centre of gravity, equal to 0.4 times the relevant weight;
- (ii) any installation or part of an installation dependent upon components made of brittle material for its earthquake resistance shall withstand a force, acting through the appropriate centre of gravity of the dependent parts and equal to 1.5 times the relevant weight. If the strength of the brittle components is established by calculation and not by type test, the appropriate force shall be 3.0 times the relevant weight;
- (iii) any installation mounted on a high and/or flexible structure shall be able to withstand forces of twice these magnitudes.
